Bion underlines that the bear of frustration is a genetically pre-established factor of personality. The most obvious parallel with Winnicott 1966, 1971 has to do with times of the mother's absence, briefly at first, but growing with the infant's ability to tolerance delay of need satisfaction. Some ways this happens is the movement from destructive patterns, such as envy and self-centeredness, to more wholesome and relationship building behaviors like joy, self-control, and love Galatians 5:16-25.

Personality Theory

In this regard, Walter Benjamin Benjamin 1955 distinguished two types of possibilities in the concept of experience: the first derives from accretion, through the slow deposit of successive encounters, which leads to the domestication of otherness, so to speak, to its entry into our usual familiar, personal world; the second, through illumination, in which moments of breaking through occur within the strata and deposits.
