THE GORGE Is found by placing one arm of the square resting on  $20\frac{1}{2}$  and the X; this latter point being fixed at one-third of the half neck from the neck point. As far as the cutting of this class of jacket is concerned, we think we have said enough to point out the special features to be observed, and the dangers to be avoided, so we will now pass on to give a few hints on the various styles in which these are being worn. In this defect a most uncomfortable pressure is felt when the arms rest at the sides, but plenty of ease exists for the arm being brought forward; there is a lot of fulness and foul material at the top of hind-arm, and a general tendency for the cuff to stand away from the hand.
