Moreover, as the number of components in the packages increased, both the number of teachers receiving the package and the likelihood of their turnover decreased. In 1988, there were about 65,000 first-year teachers; by 2008, this number had grown to over 200,000 see Figure 1.

Induction Experiences of Beginning Secondary Teachers in Solomon Islands

The development of an effective induction programme has important implications for beginning teachers in Solomon Islands and those involved in their professional learning. It is often used to reduce the staffing load of a beginning teacher to 80% of a full load and provide time for the beginning teacher to attend professional development seminars, to attend networking groups of beginning teachers or to undertake observations of teaching practice.
