Lectures on the Early History of Institutions by Henry Sumner Maine, Paperback

Today, the fastest growing segments of the student population consists of non-traditional students: low-income students, full-time workers, working adults, parents, and those seeking continuing and professional education. At the date at which the Book of Aicill was put together the Irish division of the Family seems only to have had importance in the law of succession after death. And this I suppose—differing, I own, from several high authorities—to be the true significance of the Sponsio and Restipulatio, which we know to have been of the essence of the ancient Roman Conductio, and of the agreement to appear before the Prætor in thirty days.

This is the impression that they always constituted, as they practically do now, a distinct class or section of the community, each member of the class standing in a closer relation to the other members than to the rest of the national or tribal society to which all belong. The description given by Gaius of the Legis Actio Sacramenti is followed by a lacuna in the manuscript.

Sir Henry Sumner Maine (1822

I have already stated that I consider the fifth person in the group of five to be the parent from whom all the other members of the four divisions spring, or with whom they are connected by adoptive descent. So little were ideas changed that, as we shall see, the very affections and emotions which the natural bond evoked were called forth in extraordinary strength by the artificial tie. He then served notice of the distress on the debtor whom he had distrained, letting him know where what was distrained was impounded.

An English Court of Justice is in great part an engine for working out this process.

Educational Reforms

But if the account is in any degree correct, all who have attended to this class of subjects will observe at once that the elements of what we are accustomed to consider the specially Germanic land- system are present in the territorial arrangements of the Irish tribe. It was, that Fosterage was an institution which, though artificial in its commencements, was natural in its operations; and that the relation of foster-parent and foster-child tended, in that stage of feeling, to become indistinguishable from the relation of father and son. The true explanation was one which is only now dawning on us.
