Hussein perceived himself to be beset by a number of domestic and regional challenges that he believed war would resolve. The danger is that, having declared its intention to prioritize those larger threats, America will continue in practice to prioritize Iran and, in trying to do all three, do none particularly well.

The Great Powers and the Middle East

A good bit of analysis has been written about it, but I don't think enough, since you mentioned our two biggest objectives in the Middle East has always been ever since the Carter Doctrine, obviously is to prevent the rise of a hostile power and to prevent those types of attacks. The cold war, which from Iran's standpoint was a replay of the Anglo-Russian rivalry of an earlier time, offered some scope for classic Iranian maneuver. It appears today that Moscow finds itself at a disadvantage vis-à-vis Washington both in strategic arms negotiations and regarding regional issues.
