Tariffs and Growth in the Late 19th Century, The Economic Journal

There are some circumstances in which tariffs on particular countries could be justified. We therefore explore the relationship between economic growth and agricultural tariffs, industrial tariffs, and revenue tariffs, for a sample of relatively well-developed countries between 1875 and 1913. The paper was written while O'Rourke was a Government of Ireland Senior Research Fellow, and we thank the Irish Research Council for the Humanities and Social Sciences for their generous financial support.

Journal The Economic Journal — Wiley Published: Apr 1, 2000. Needless to say, the usual disclaimer applies. But we ought to ask ourselves whether tariffs are the right tool to address these problems.

The Structure of Protection and Growth in the Late 19th Century

To an extent, the recent resurgence of the tariff, as a tool of American foreign relations, represents a departure from a firm commitment to free trade that has been a mainstay of American diplomacy since the end of World War II. In any event, I believe that tariffs are not the best means for the U.

The Tariff Today Tariffs, and the threat of tariffs, have become central to U. The Constitution did, though, give Congress the power to regulate the tariff.

Tariffs and Growth in the Late 19th Century, The Economic Journal

There can be no doubt that the offshoring of jobs and IP theft by countries like as China poses a tangible threat to American workers. This analysis reveals that tariffs in the modern era no longer further the same interests as those served earlier in our history, which were to raise revenue for the federal government and to protect American industry.

The Structure of Protection and Growth in the Late 19th Century

There was no relationship between revenue tariffs and growth. Agricultural tariffs were negatively correlated with growth, although the relationship was often statistically insignificant at conventional levels.
