The Italians, it read, were alarmed for the safety of their African colonies. Nick Rankin, in his introduction, describes Caesar in Abyssinia as Steer's 'remarkable - and partisan - account of the last great episode of armed colonial conquest in Africa, the Italo-Ethiopian war of 1935-36. The dispute took upon itself the grander dimensions which the British Legation at Addis had always prophesied, which followed directly from the attitude of the Ethiopian Emperor, determined to take his stand upon the Covenant and to resist aggression.

He therefore left in Italian hands the whole waterline running east of Gerlogubi; while the other water system which it crosses at right angles at Gorahai and which runs north and south along the Fafan was again in Ethiopian hands, which had a right to it by treaty. Tall grass, mimosa trees in green parasol, the buck leg-high amid grass and trees, twitching their tails against white rumps, and studying with young liquid eyes our little white tramway as it prattled on.

But look where I might in Abyssinia, with the assistance of Holmes, Collins, Harrison, Lowenthal and the British Red Cross, I could never find the fellow. The Italian road between Ferfer and Gabridihari also fell into Ethiopian hands, and encouraged them to continue the lorry-track from Gabridihari northwards through Daggahbur to Jijiga—through waterpoints made famous in the subsequent war, Borkut Sasabaneh and Anale. Barton knew everything about Italian aims and activities in Ethiopia.

He regularly told them, with that sarcastic twist of his under the grey moustache, and looking at them steadily between the eyes, when he thought them asses—unwise he would say. And so it happened that the Emperor of Ethiopia, Haile Selassie, was the first African ruler to organise a mechanised force. Witty, lucid and penetrating, Evelyn Waugh captures the dilemmas and complexities of a feudal society caught up in twentieth-century politics and confrontation.
