Jamaica Plain

A late survivor was Croft Ale, brewed in the Highland Spring Brewery building until 1953, when it became the Rosoff Pickle factory, where the pickle vats could be seen from the commuter trains passing by. By the time he was 22, he was employed as a professional house painter, a vocation he would hold the remainder of his life.

In 1873, West Roxbury residents — most living in Jamaica Plain — voted in favor of annexation to Boston. The house, a defining image in urban New England architecture, first showed up in the 1870s, and spread rapidly in the 1890s. Ten years later, Moss Hill Road and Woodland Road were laid out on land owned by the Bowditch family, creating the most exclusive neighborhood in Jamaica Plain until this day.
