Archive, Media, Trauma

The website is still more disorganized than I'd like it to be, since I haven't finished selecting the core readings for all of the weeks, nor even the books I recommend for purchase, which differ slightly depending on your focus German, public, US history, non-history fields.

Hist 201E homepage: seminar, Prof. Marcuse, UCSB History Dept., 2007

Contains an alphabetical listing of many dozens of newspaper articles, websites and pieces by Filreis himself. On the other hand, there is a consistent preoccupation with traumatic memory, that is, with the ways past episodes, which have been blocked out of private or public consciousness, return to haunt the present in various displaced manifestations. Is the viewer's perception of reality eroded by the universal availability of imagery intended to shock? While it is still too early to gain a comprehensive understanding of the developments underway, some emerging trends are nevertheless perceptible.

About a testimony in the Fortunoff video archive at Yale.

Remembering Oradour

It concentrates exclusively on those aspects of significance and relevance which are the product of memory--that is, of a recourse to the past- and which appear only in the light of later readings. More scientific than historical, but interesting essays nonetheless. Lots of links and bibliographies.
