Parliamentary election in Israel 1992

This process is uncommon in Israeli electoral behavior, as Israeli voters when changing their electoral choice have tended to stay within camps, or at least transfer their loyalty to allied camps. But the Likud leadership did not wake up even at the end of the race when the public opinion polls indicated that Labor was leading.

He looks traditional, wears a kippa, but talks liberal. This will be visible to the community. The Lubavitcher Hassidim did not campaign this time for any party so they did not bring out those extra votes that the two parties had received last time.

The 1992 Knesset Elections Revisited: Implications for the Future

It is the politically right equivalent of Meretz. The election saw the beginning of a period lasting almost two decades where the left- and right-wing blocs held roughly equal numbers of seats in the Knesset. It should be noted that Arye Deri of Shas was a good Minister of Interior.
