Stuart also signaled his rejection of the now canonical poetry of Wallace Stevens and T. Stuart wrote these poems during the Depression years, and the poet laments the passing of the traditional hill way of life, protests the fragmentation of modern society and the exploitation of workers, fears social anarchy, and yet is ready to riot. Edited and with an Introduction by Jim Wayne Miller.

Man with a Bull

Twenty years later, he submitted the story unchanged to the , which accepted the story and published it in February 1943; it was later collected in Tales from Plum Grove Hills. Man With a Bull-Tongue Plow is a collection of sonnets that Stuart weaves into a personal narrative describing the rural Kentucky life and events he knew so well.
