This was the inheritance of the liberal opposition when Kim Dae Jung entered the Blue House in the first days of 1998. The nucleus of the future Republic of Korea Army, over which the us would retain operative command, was staffed with Japanese-trained officers. Ms Park grew up there as the daughter of the dictator Park Chung-Hee, who ruled the Republic of Korea with an iron fist after the 1961 military coup that brought him to power.

These repressive forces were immediately unleashed against a rebellion that spread across the South in 1948, initially sparked by protests against police terror on Cheju island, and fighting for independence and unification. . Attacks on the police proliferated as Japanese Army units disintegrated, and half-starved Koreans returned to their villages from forced labour in mines and factories to confront the collaborators who had sent them there.

Nor were the liberal leaders interested in an alliance with the now highly mobilized working class that might have posed a fundamental challenge to the ruling order. The US thereby forestalled any national accounting with the forces that had collaborated with Japanese fascism; and indeed it was this layer that went on to rule the Republic of Korea. Strike waves broke out repeatedly against the sweatshop conditions of the textile industry, soon joined by workers in the steel, auto, shipbuilding, machine-tools and electronics sectors.
