Léopold Sédar Senghor

African-language literatures came to be regarded as a distinct province of the general landscape of imaginative life and literary activity on the African continent Jahn 1961 and 1966; Gérard 1971 and 1981. It also accounts for the specific historical and cultural context in which this expression has been manifested in Africa and the Caribbean: the formal particularities of the literary corpus, both oral and written, that can be ascribed to the two areas, and the diversity of material and texts covered by the representative works.
