The Barbarian Invasions of the Roman Empire by Thomas Hodgkin

Old stories of occurrences handed down by tradition, but scantily confirmed by experience, suddenly ceased to be incredible; there were earthquakes of unparalleled extent and violence; eclipses of the sun occurred with a frequency unrecorded in previous history; there were great droughts in sundry places and consequent famines, and that most calamitous and awfully fatal visitation, the plague. First there came and stood by him a dream, which showed to him the truth of the evils that were about to come to pass in respect of his son. So then in sending to his other allies he sent also to Lacedemon.

The latent separatism of the Eastern provinces and, undoubtedly, some commercial advantages caused them to accept Palmyrene domination without difficulty, as they had, in the past, supported Avidius Cassius and against the legitimate emperors. Despite having few friends, he makes it his mission to operate on the fringes of civilization, dispatching any threats to the nearby Ten Towns that he encounters.

6 Infamous Sacks of Rome

The Corcyraeans, alarmed at the news of their preparations, being without a single ally in Hellas for they had not enrolled themselves either in the Athenian or in the Lacedaemonian confederacy, decided to repair to Athens in order to enter into alliance and to endeavour to procure support from her. Yet it was considered that Pausanias had here been guilty of a grave offence, which, interpreted by the light of the attitude which he had since assumed, gained a new significance, and seemed to be quite in keeping with his present schemes. When the Corinthian preparations were completed, they took three days' provisions and put out from Chimerium by night, ready for action. Clovis died in the Roman fort at Paris in 511 AD.
