Land Change Science Program

Global Ecology and Biogeography, 12 5 , 361—371. A global change scenario elevated CO₂ and resulting change of plant species composition, which might indirectly result in the loss of biodiversity, was simulated for each of the 15 functional groups in the soil food web.

Land Cover and Land

As mentioned earlier, the use of land refers to the occupation of a certain area according to its agrological capacity and therefore its development potential, it is classified according to its location as urban or rural, it represents a fundamental element for the development of the city and its inhabitants since it is from these that its urban structure is formed and therefore its functionality is defined. If land use change is the dominant agent of climate forcing at the urban scale, Kyoto-based emissions trading schemes may fail to sufficiently safeguard human health in the most heavily populated regions of the planet.

Global warming

Indeed, the presence of natural phenomenon that represents a threat to human life activities implies a limitation in the use of land.

Land Use Change

In these situations, judicial decisions and enforcement of private land-use arrangements can reinforce public regulation, and achieve forms and levels of control that regulatory zoning cannot.
