We Finally Understand The Ending Of The Sopranos

What did Melfi do to deserve that? Russian soprano Anna Netrebko was discovered by the conductor, but her success since then has all been based on her quality as an opera performer. For a physically and emotionally terrorized Melfi, Tony now represents protection — and, possibly, revenge. Things get a little more interesting when Meadow reveals where she wants to take her law career in the future.

A critic responds to the "Sopranos" brutal rape scene

Janice Soprano: Janice, like her mother, breathes fire.

A critic responds to the "Sopranos" brutal rape scene

With over a decade's worth of hindsight and discussion, we finally understand the ending of The Sopranos, and we're about to break it all down. And this isn't just Tony being paranoid.

We Finally Understand The Ending Of The Sopranos

Chances are good that the screen cuts to black because that's the moment where Tony dies.

Trefin

Then, in the penultimate episode of the series, Melfi comes to a realization after a colleague encourages her to read up on how Tony, as a sociopath, might simply be taking advantage of her. Chase has been asked several more times to reflect on the ending in the years since the series finale, and each time, he's remained relatively ambiguous in his interpretation. After a string of relationships that ended badly, Meadow Soprano played by ends the series on an upbeat note, as it looks like her life is finally coming together.
