Do-gen discusses a special robe ceremony he observed in China and also notes that there were two Korean lay disciples at the temple who seemed especially dedicated to seeking the Dharma. The bottom line of the controversy, regardless of how it might be resolved, is that Do-gen inherited a rich, expansive body of traditional ko-an cases kosoku-ko-an that was shared by different texts and schools but that also gave rise to diverse and often highly factionalized interpretations and styles of composition. To shield herself from further disappointments, she has secluded herself in a small apartment, and does not take the opportunity to socialize with neighbors and peers in the same building.
