The Executive Agency Revolution in Whitehall: Public Interest versus Bureau

Recently I have focused on how government communicates information to citizens about public services to facilitate accountability and encourage cooperation with service provision. This interest builds on previous research on structural change within public organisations as part of the ESRC funded 'Structure and Organisation of Government' project and work on the causes and effects of public management leadership change on organisational performance, including the ESRC funded chief executive succession project.

Citizens' Blame of Politicians for Public Service Failure: Experimental Evidence about Blame Reduction through Delegation and Contracting

The Executive Agency Revolution in Whitehall: Public Interest versus Bureau

Journal of Public Administration Research and Theory, 27 1, 197-209. Improved economy was not achieved and efficiency and effectiveness was hampered by a lack of co-ordination or failure to 'join-up' government. This includes the way information about public services eg for local environmental, educational, police or health services affect citizens and service users' perceptions of services, behaviour towards services including use of service and cooperation with service providers.

The Executive Agency Revolution in Whitehall by O. James

This work has been published in articles in the British Journal of Political Science, Journal of Politics, Public Administration Review, Journal of Public Administration Research and Theory and Public Administration. International collaborations include with OECD, World Bank and public organisations in several countries. Senior officials, keen to protect their policy work position at a time of pressure from politicians to be more managerial, passed their executive tasks to agencies.
