Goodbody (Clara)

Later on even the meeting house in Clara would pass to the local musical society. Acting as a policy advisory body — Offaly History endeavors to ensure all government departments, local authorities, tourism agencies and key opinion formers prioritise heritage matters.

Helen McCabe's Goodbody Family Page.

Michael Goodbody tells the story in twenty chapters from their arrival in Ireland after 1600 and the tribulations of the 'younger' John Goodbody after the 1660s due to his refusal to pay tithes to the established church.

Clara and the Goodbody textile factory and mills, by Michael Goodbody

Connections had been established with families such as Pim and Manly who were later to be prominent in business in Tullamore. It was Robert James who, as the joint owner of the Tullamore tobacco factory, was active in securing gas lighting and a town council for Tullamore in 1860. Bales of jute were imported from East Pakistan.

Clara White 1865

The Goodbodys are now gone from Clara, their houses and land disposed of, the mills have mostly been demolished and the factory at Clashawaun is a quiet relic of its former activity. It was adopted on August 18, 1920.

Goodbodys of Clara, Limerick Branch 1965

In Tullamore the older meeting house of the 1850s was sold in 1884 to the local lodge of Freemasons.

Rubber brands are hand-cut for printing sacks on the hand-fed Sphinx machines. Clara White was 74 years old when World War II: Nazi Germany and Slovakia invade Poland, beginning the European phase of World War II.

Reflections The Goodbody Factory

By the 1850s and until the 1880s the Goodbodys were the leading business people in Tullamore and continued as an important force alongside Egans and Williams from the 1890s until the shop in Bridge Street closed in 1929. . Some important business records have survived, but this is not the rich vein it ought to be because the principal businesses of the family in Ireland, milling and tobacco, were under severe pressure by the 1920s and records were lost.
