The Child Care Crisis Is Keeping Women Out of the Workforce

This could suggest that Head Start and child care subsidies serve some low-income families well, but that in the absence of that assistance, other families find themselves unable to find an affordable option that meets their needs. As an exercise, though, consider one of the facts.

The Child Care Crisis Is Keeping Women Out of the Workforce

Why is this thing, which never had many legs to stand on, so pervasive even today, 35 years after it was devised? In many countries with poor capacity to produce national statistics, labor force participation is measured from population censuses, rather than from labor force surveys especially designed for that purpose.

'Women Own 1% of World Property': A Feminist Myth That Won't Die

In the beginning of the post we point out that since 1980, female participation in labor markets has increased in most countries; yet according to the the global trend only increased slightly over the same period — from 50. Notably, there have been large reductions in South and East Asia, and large increases in Latin America. In the last section of this blog post we provide an overview of the forces that drive this correlation, borrowing from our on the determinants of female labor force participation.
