Lafayette Park, Detroit

The neighbourhood demonstrates the role of careful thought during development—as opposed to some Toronto condos where it feels like buying the land to build upon was the only planning consideration. In general, the neighborhood, including portions developed by other architects, has been regarded as an incubator of progressive architecture and one of the few historically stable urban renewal zones in the United States. The Jean Rivard apartments is a series of three-story apartment buildings set between Larned, Lafayette, the I-375, and Rivard.

Cherboneau North featured garden-style homes with glass-enclosed walkup stairways between corridors. Most of all, it should serve as an inspiration for all those who are committed to ambitious thinking about public housing and urbanism.

The design is a more conventional form of the Mies courtyard house, on a somewhat larger scale.

The success of the project in increasing tax revenue was such that the city engaged a similar program in Corktown, leveling much of a neighborhood of frame houses in favor of industrial property. The townhouses would be operated as apartments until 1961-1962, when they were converted into four co-operatives.

The east section included a square shopping center with access from Orleans. There is an eight-story tower in the complex, off Orleans. Thanks to the foresight of the team who developed it, Lafayette Park has resisted the decay that has afflicted Detroit in the years since its groundbreaking in 1956.

The final Mies-designed project was Lafayette Towers 1961-1964, two towers perpendicular to the original site plan that were connected by a central garage, and serviced by a central mechanical plant. Ultimately, the project could not find funding as mixed-income housing, and the original plan was not realized. It was the setting for a pivotal scene in Elmore Leonards City Primeval, and in 2014, Jewish Ensemble Theater produced an eponymous play.

Chernoneau South is a complex of conventional garden-style homes. Easy and practical is not it??? Consistent with Birkertss design philosophy, no cars are visible from the street.
