Dismembering Remembering:

Mourning with Disgust in Delbo's Auschwitz and After.

Everyday anxieties and geographies of risk The government, according to some MOers, was not doing enough to offset such emotive impact, and certainly across the testimonies we see heightened emotions and a wide emotional repertoire. Prevailing generic forms seemed unable to address — or address only in formulaic ways — either pervasive experiences of downward mobility and precarity among whites, or the historic and ongoing violence, domination, and segregation that characterize life across the color line, despite formal equality, let alone link them together. I suggest that the newspaper press set an emotional tone which the social actors of the time absorbed and reacted against.

However, these key terms are ideologically loaded and have historically excluded Indigenous knowledge systems for instance Delgamuukw v. This gives to trauma-theory a double set of objectives, but also of historical tasks: on the one hand, it opens up trauma-theory to the experience and memory of events other than the Holocaust and their representation , as in personal memoirs, autobiography, testimony or family history, but also in the more public realm of wars and armed conflict the First World War, the Vietnam War, ethnic cleansing in the Balkans.

‘Archives of Feeling’: the AIDS Crisis in Britain 1987

Partisan Review 23 4 : 568—573.

How is this obsessive interest to be explained? I hone in on a particular crisis — the AIDS epidemic in the UK; and a particular year: 1987. This is important in that it allows the discussion to go beyond the usual therapeutic categories, whether they are poetological or Freudian. Nevertheless, her analysis of these texts offers an insightful close reading and a thought-provoking working hypothesis.

Toward the end of the book Delbo is back in France, years after the liberation of the camps, at the deathbed of Germaine, another companion from Auschwitz.

PETER HUJAR & DAVID WOJNAROWICZ: "Some Sort of Grace" (2010)

The violent strength of the sensation and, as the stain of the Real within the Symbolic Order, its resistance to aesthetic transformation, suggest that disgust might have a particularly privileged relationship to the communication of trauma, or at least that it could function strategically in its representation. . The meaning of feelings, or the sense of experience and its meaning, is rhetorically mediated, as our genres not only name feelings and stipulate causes but tell us how to judge those feelings or relate to those causes.
