Composition : En deux parties numérotées mais non titrées. Like his father, Jean-Zacharie held the position of lieutenant general at the Présidial of Bourg, a judicial tribunal that existed under the Ancien Régime. However, he emphasized that there are relatively few such volitions in God.

Traité de morale : Malebranche, Nicolas, 1638

According to this account, Malebranche was driven by this problem with Cartesian dualism to propose that it is God who brings it about that our sensations and volitions are correlated with motions in our body. Malebranche developed this last point in his 1680 Traité de la nature et de la grâce Treatise on Nature and Grace. Les deux souverains et frères fixent la frontière entre les royaumes de et de.

This point indicates that Malebranche took moral action to require a consideration not only of abstract relations of perfection, but also the happiness of the self. The presence of various evils in the world is problematic for anyone who claims that this world was created by a God who has infinite power, knowledge and goodness. The first five books enumerate the various errors deriving from the senses, imagination, pure understanding, inclinations and passions, respectively, and a sixth book is devoted to the Cartesian method of avoiding such errors through attention to clear and distinct ideas.

Plate Eight, from Petit Traite de Morale

There can be a necessary causal connection in only one case, namely, the connection between the volitions of an omnipotent agent and its upshots.

This is so because according to mechanism, bodily collision necessitates change in motion. If God conserves a body by creating it in the same place from moment to moment, that body remains at rest, and if he conserves it by creating it in different places from moment to moment, it is in motion. However, none of these thinkers went as far as Malebranche in arguing that God must produce all real changes in nature.
