The engineering problems were substantial and the results, to begin with, were not always predictable. Retinopathy of prematurity was not the only disease caused by medical treatment; increasing interest in the neonate was accompanied by the rapid use of new drugs such as chloramphenicol and the sulphonamides, and, as immature babies did not metabolise these like adults, overdosage might occur. Although some children might die of the acute illness 700 in 1949, falling to 174 in 1957 , the main problem was that about half developed rheumatic disease of heart valves, which became incompetent they leaked or stenosed they obstructed blood flow.
