The Symposium by Plato

The life of the party 26 August 2015 You've really got to love the way Plato writes philosophy. This proposal having been accepted, Eryximachus proceeded as follows:- I will begin, he said, after the manner of Melanippe in Euripides, Not mine the word which I am about to speak, but that of Phaedrus.

Well, he said, jesting apart, tell me when the meeting occurred.

It was a little bit hard to hold the magnifying glass, for some reason, and it kept getting in the way of the brandy bottle. Like Agathon and Aristophanes, Alcibiades is a historical person from ancient Athens. Yet I know very well that I am speaking the truth, although you may laugh.

The Symposium Quotes by Plato

Pausanias came to a pause--this is the balanced way in which I have been taught by the wise to speak; and Aristodemus said that the turn of Aristophanes was next, but either he had eaten too much, or from some other cause he had the hiccough, and was obliged to change turns with Eryximachus the physician, who was reclining on the couch below him. You know what he's like. Speaking priority is given to those towards the end of their award who have not spoken at the symposium before.

It was a little nippy that day. From this point of view a man fairly argues in Athens to love and to be loved is held to be a very honourable thing.

Aristophanes, in Plato's world, tells us why we feel whole, complete, when we're with our true love: Once upon a time, we were all two-bodied and two-souled beings, all male, all female, or hermaphroditic.
