Feminist Ethics (Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy)

Feminists, those influenced by Post-modern philosophers, are at home with the conviction that there is no objective, universally valid knowledge, because humans are irrevocably individual historical agents, creatures located in time, place, and culture. Critics of utilitarianism include those who specifically resist the expectation of utilitarian impartiality, insofar as impartiality in decision-making ignores emotional connections or personal relationships with particular beings. The fact that feminist ethics is a liberation ethics with Marxist heritage poses a separate problem.

Intimate Citizenship

In the early-to-mid-twentieth century, at the same time that feminism became a more popularly used term in Europe and the Americas, more theorists argued influentially for ending unjust discrimination on the basis of sex. Sex is good whether you're married or not, and certainly folks who wait until marriage can have a lot of sex once they tie the knot. The provocation to alertness is evident in feminist critiques of traditional ethical theories such as deontology, consequentialism, social contract theory, and virtue ethics.

The moral case for sex before marriage

Intimacy in the western modern world has been shaped massively by the rise of an individualist ideology which increasingly seems to create a world of choices. Further, they have argued that ethics should be concerned not only with actions and relationships, but also with questions of character and the development of attitudes of trust within relationships, a theme that has special significance for Annette Baier.
