Science and Technology and US Foreign Policy

Immigrants have long been a source of innovation in the United States. Since the space race was a topic discussed across agencies, FRUS is a useful access point to material from Presidential Libraries, the Department of State, the Department of Defense, the National Security Council, the Central Intelligence Agency, the United States Information Agency, and private papers. Few challenges to the whole pattern of our foreign aid will be more severe than this.

Without a National Artificial Intelligence Strategy, the United States Risks Missing Out on All the Technology's Benefits—And Falling Behind Rivals Such as China

World War II was the first war in history in which the weapons in use at the end of the war differed significantly from those employed at the outset.

Second, and closely related, industrialization heightened an emerging sense of national identity and professionalization among citizens in the leading industrialized nations. Yet the scientific revolution in a proper sense, when it finally came, was peculiarly a phenomenon of Western Europe. In addition, the scientists in the two countries were not familiar with each other and there were significant language and cultural issues.

Technology, Science and American Foreign Policy

The scientists began a dialogue. The , prompted by the realization that the United States was falling behind in the space race, is legislation worth emulating. Nor is it just the evolution of weaponry that changes warfare.
