'We should stop running away from the past'

The idea of a National Gallery of British Art was first proposed in the 1820s by. Henry Tate began his working life in grocery shops in Liverpool, then made his fortune in sugar refining and through purchasing the patent for sugar cubes from its German originator ; and sugar, of course, was one of the main commodities behind the brutality of the slave trade. Those of us who are not bolstered by outside sources, those of us who are but still struggle, and say it out loud, often run the risk of seeming whiny or ungrateful; maybe we worry we will just be thought not good enough.

A photograph of an example, taken from a marble rhyton in the Palazzo dei Conservatori in Rome, belonged to Alma-Tadema and seems to have had some influence on the conception of his painting Autumn, mentioned above.

Henry Tate (1873)

This shows various works of modern art from the Tate collection as well as mounting its own temporary exhibitions.

Is it careful about the programmes it has established to educate students about civil and human rights? With his roots in Dutch realism, Alma-Tadema is far more inclined to provide an unvarnished account of this aspect of the pagan world. The Tate Galleries and Slavery

Tate Museums UK The Tate is no longer a single museum devoted to the national collections of British and international modern art, but a group of four galleries: founded 1897 as the National Gallery of British Art ; opened 2000 ; opened 1988 ; opened 1993 ; Between them, these four institutions care for a of over 66,000 works classified into two broad groups: British art since 1500, and international modern and contemporary art. Neither of these two new Tates had a significant effect on the functioning of the original London Tate Gallery, whose size was increasingly proving a constraint as the collection grew.

Such terms sanitise complex power relationships and imply a fanciful relational equality. When Robert Vernon presented a large gift of British works to the Gallery in 1847, they had to be displayed elsewhere: first at Vernon's private house, and later at Marlborough House. He gave £42,000 to the Liverpool University College, founded in 1881; and a still larger sum to the Liverpool hospitals.

Correspondence of Sir Henry Tate

In 2006 a pub in his home town was named after the sugar magnate. Then, when he came to London, he presented four free public libraries to the parish of Lambeth. Times, 30 April 1892, p.
