By the 1820s, the soundscape of enslaved and free African Americans merged with and transformed the musical traditions of Scotch-Irish immigrants, creating a potently creative cocktail of new American music that stayed with Mount for life. As well as being a fine artist, he was also a musician, composer and collector of the folk music of early America. It is said that Mount felt that Rembrandt, a great Dutch painter of the 17th century, was helping him with his painting skills through the séances.
