The Armistice site was restored by German prisoner-of-war labour following the Second World War, with its memorials and monuments either restored or reassembled. A and an were named in his honor. The French Army fought under the new doctrines, but they failed in the first battles of August 1914, and it remained to be seen whether the Napoleonic doctrine would hold its own, would give way to doctrines evolved during the war, or would incorporate the new moral and technical elements into a new outward form within which the spirit of Napoleon remained unaltered.

Frederick Ferdinand Fox by MILLER, Edward

Foch advocated peace terms that would make Germany unable to pose a threat to France ever again. In the Belgian city of , one of the central squares was named after him after the First World War, but it was renamed in 2012. The president of the board was French general Jean-Marie Charles Payot 1868—1931 , assisted by an international staff.
