The Fellahin of Upper Egypt: Their Religious Social and Industrial Life To

His work differs from Blackman's in focusing on larger moulids throughout Egypt and local Cairene moulids, while she concentrates on all moulids, large and small, in Middle Egypt. I do not wish to imply that jealousy is uncommon in other parts of the world, but I certainly think that it has a large share in the general make-up of the Egyptian character.

For information specifically on women anthropologists, see U. BASKET-MAKERS IN A SMALL VILLAGE IN FAYUM 160 89. These physical features are, I think, reflected in the character of the peasants, for it is a remarkable fact that the most divergent traits of character can be seen in a single individual.
