Building Capacity for Nursing and Midwifery Education Through an Asynchronous Online Course

Three sequential online educational modules for English-speaking and Spanish-speaking nurse and midwife educators focused on a principles of teaching and learning, b instructional strategies, and c methods to evaluate students and courses. Their reciprocal bond with education programs is one of mutual dedication to the profession. In the United States, the first modern day nurse-midwives were British-educated women brought to this country by Mary Breckinridge in 1925.

Building Capacity for Nursing and Midwifery Education Through an Asynchronous Online Course

Given the many advantages of precepting a clinical midwifery student, including financial benefits, more clinical practices may want to consider partnering with a midwifery education program in educating future midwives. Such laws may cause midwives to leave a restrictive state and move elsewhere to work, potentially decreasing access to midwifery care in that state.
