Decline The community lasted until John Humphrey Noyes attempted to pass the leadership thereof to his son, Theodore Noyes. The branches were closed in 1854 except for the Wallingford branch, which operated until devastated by a tornado in 1878.

Male continence (1877 edition)

Various contemporary sources contend that Noyes himself was the subject of criticism, although less often and of probably less severe criticism than the rest of the community. Noyes believe that complex marriage would move the community beyond divisive commitments to a single partner or family.
