And, at the end of this sequence, as Miyagi sits sewing by the sleeping Genjuro and their son, a few seconds in the fixed shot represents the passage of a few hours from night to morning by means of the magic of lighting and otherworldly music. There is a poem on it in his wife's handwriting. He asks his neighbor, who knows about an old man.

Collected in Book 4 See A Serpent's Lust The Blue Hood - A traveling monk, Myokei Kaian, leads an abbot to deliverance, who has been attracted by a servant boy and turned into an ogre. There are stories here which describe love and betrayal as well as encounters with evil spirits, while others are more like religious parables or sermons o Although some of these stories have interesting and supernatural elements to them, they're, like much of classic Japanese writing, drowned in formal, long-winded prose, with many nods and direct references to Japanese history and literature, something which would fall upon deaf ears if the reader isn't already well acquainted to these things.
