Spreadsheets

Views of the data, some of which looked like spreadsheets, others like charts, could be created dynamically and were not limited in number. This was also photographed using the 55mm macro lens on a Nikon 8008s.

Lotus Improv

It was sometimes criticized for its complexity and bloat. Cell selection in both Excel and Lotus 123 allows the to be selected, sorted and various operations to be handled by different cells.

Lotus 1

Sachs was responsible for the technical development of Lotus 1-2-3, version 1, for which he developed all of the original code. IBM discontinued development of IBM Lotus Symphony in 2012 with the final release of version 3.

Symphony added the functions of word processing and telecommunications to the spreadsheet, business graphics, and data management functions of 1-2-3, providing the user with a totally integrated package. Teaching the use of spreadsheet modelling was common in , often using marked up with a layout similar to the paper versions. In March 1994, Lotus decided to attack this problem by re-positioning Improv as an add-in for 1-2-3, although the programs had nothing in common other than Improv's ability to read data in 1-2-3 files.
