The idea is that any resolution to attain Buddhahood may easily be forgotten or abandoned during the aeons ahead. Recent accusations of groping, assault, and harassment committed by both Zen and Tibetan teachers, including Sakyong Mipham Rinpoche, the leader of the largest Buddhist organization in the West, and Eido Shimano, founder of one of the largest and most influential American Zen organizations, have shown that this space is just as vulnerable to abuse and corruption as other places once thought safe in our society: A boardroom. He exhibited and published the copies of the murals in 1943, which helped to publicize and give much prominence to the art of Dunhuang within China.
