Ultimately widespread opposition both locally and nationally led the Council in mid November to 'suspend' the projected sales. . Such failure led to a considerable furore locally, with at least one active supporter of the Gallery publicly announcing that he would reconsider an intended bequest of a picture by Sickert to the Gallery.

It would seem evident that the wellbeing of the Institute then demanded that swift action should be taken, and that the requirements of employment law in regard to staff redundancies made it impossible for it to put out a comprehensive statement of its position at the outset. Suppose that instead of a panic move to sell art because of a crisis, a museum set out a well-conceived plan that included the sale of works for an operating endowment; and that there was a commitment from donors for the greater part of the needed endowment; and the plan was laid out for open discussion in the local community and national museum world. These loan arrangements, which were renewed in December 2005 for another twelve years, 21 involve 35 pictures being on long-term loan to Dublin, and in addition two groups of four pictures each representing the 'core' of the Bequest, rotating between London and Dublin on a five-yearly basis.
