In more recent times, even as the right to arms has become more politically controversial, the Second Amendment has served as a kind of curious bit player in Supreme Court opinions dealing with the right to privacy. Supreme Court Justice Joseph Story expressed his fear that popular neglect of the militia, which even by that date had considerably less than universal participation, could weaken the arming of the population: The right of the citizens to keep, and bear arms has justly been considered, as the palladium of the liberties of a republic; since it offers a strong moral check against the usurpation and arbitrary power of rulers; and will generally, even if these are successful in the first instance, enable the people to resist, and triumph over them.

It is interesting in light of this history that the Second Amendment's right to arms is one of the few provisions of the Bill of Rights that has not been incorporated.
