Review

After spending several weeks doing heavy lifting on a polycultural, sustainable smallholding in the Shenandoah Valley, Pollan cooked a meal wholly made up of ingredients that he himself had a hand in producing: eggs from genuinely free-range, grub-eating hens, corn grown with compost from those happy birds, and, finally, a chicken whose throat he had slit himself. Ultimately, the authors are dealing with issues of morality -- man's relationship with the world around him, and specifically, how a principled person or business can thrive in the modern world without compromising ideals. We meant mutually respectful growers and eaters.
